Conference on Antitrust enforcement in the presence of leniency programs

Date: August 30 2011, 09.00-16.00

Where: Norwegian School of Economics, Auditorium Finn Kydland

Antitrust authorities have to allocate their resources between the three main activities cartel detection, merger control and prohibition of abuse of dominance. In many jurisdictions we have witnessed a great number of cartel cases during the last 10-15 years, and the main explanation for this development is the large increase in leniency applications. At the same time we have seen a rather limited number of cases concerning abuse of dominance (or monopolization), while the number of merger cases varies considerably between jurisdictions. At this conference we have asked academic economists as well as economists from agencies to take as a starting point the apparently large success of leniency programs and discuss various questions this raises. We are particularly concerned about whether this leads to a distorted allocation of resources between the three main activities, as well as distortion of resources spent on fighting cartels. If such distortions exist, what measures can be taken to correct for them? This, in turn, raises the question of how we should design the antitrust authorities' incentives. We would like to encourage the agencies to strike the right balance between the various activities, and also within each activity, but what would then be the best way to measure their performance and set goals to be achieved?

We start out with three academic economists, all outstanding researchers in the area of antitrust economics. They will give us an outsider's view on how antitrust authorities in principle should strike the right balance, and point to some of their main challenges. We then move on to three economists who all have a unique combination of academic background and hands-on experience from competition authorities. They discuss in more detail the problems associated with enforcement in practice and the allocation of resources between various activities.
